

Another disturbing scene happens when two of the family members escape the mansion, and are getting away in a car. One of the grannies catches up with them, kills the guy driving and pulls the woman back in before she can get away. Once the woman is back in the car, the grannie tells her she is free to go...as long as she sings Happy Birthday to her! So the terrified girl sings to the demonic grannie. The scene is very dark, as in a lack of lighting, and the grainy film makes this an over all chilling moment in the movie...and one that has stuck with me for years!

But one of the most fucked up scenes happens when the grannies catch up with a family member...who just happens to be a priest, and gives him two options. The first is a slow and painfully agonising death at the hands of the demons. Or he can take his own life with a gun that they give to him! The scene quickly accelerates into the grannies screaming and tormenting the priest with thoughts of them ripping him apart and eating him alive. But also reminding him God will not forgive him if he commits suicide! Totally fucked up!

Something that I noticed, even from my very brief first viewing...was that the movie seemed like it was clipped in certain parts. This scene in particular, there is a family member who is stuck in a window in the cellar. The grannies start eating him alive! But in the original Troma VHS copy it doesn't show them actually biting or dismembering. Years later I came to find out that this scene was originally extremely graphic! It depicts them ripping his muscles apart, licking his flesh, and just over all..eating him alive!

Over the years i've tried to track down an uncensored version of the film, and finally in 2007 I found it. There were rumours that you could not get an uncensored English dubbed copy without hardcoded Dutch subtitles. But there is a German release of the film on dvd that contains an English audio track that has "optional" subtitles. I believe since that release there have been more. But this was the first that I know of to include all the gory mayhem! However the Troma dvd did include the scenes, but only as an extra...with music playing over it.

I'll always consider Rabid Grannies as a really scary, frightening, and utterly fucked up movie! The combination of horror and comedy blend well to provide humor into a totally dark scenerio. The movie has stuck with me ever since my first viewing, and there have been times...late at night,where I move a little more rapidly towards my bedroom. Imagining the grannies...just right behind me.

